US Vice President JD Vance could not give a specific answer when asked when the ongoing conflict involving Iran, the United States and Israel would end. Although reluctant to describe the situation as a direct war, he acknowledged that the intensity of the conflict has increased in some areas.

Vance spoke to reporters at the White House on Thursday (September 3), answering questions about the ongoing situation and rising tensions with Iran.

According to Vance, there is currently no major active military operation underway. In his words, there is no widespread exchange of fire at the moment either. However, he acknowledged that the situation is not the same everywhere and that tensions and clashes have intensified in some areas.

The US vice president made the comments after several days of heightened military tensions between Iran and the United States. He claimed that a large-scale military campaign lasting nearly six weeks had significantly damaged Iran's ability to produce defense equipment.

However, when asked when the conflict might end, Vance could not provide a specific date or timeline. He said the answer largely depends on one key issue: when Iran will stop attacking ships.

Clarifying his position, Vance said he did not know the answer and that the question should be answered by Iran itself.

The US vice president also addressed the situation in the Strait of Hormuz. He accused Iran of obstructing the movement of ships through the strategically important maritime trade route. Amid the ongoing tensions, the Strait of Hormuz has emerged as one of the key flashpoints in the conflict.
