Iran will fulfill its commitments if the United States fully complies with the terms of their agreement, President Masoud Pezeshkian said, while warning that Tehran is prepared to respond to any form of pressure or threats.

In a post on X on Monday (June 29), Pezeshkian said that the success of any agreement depends on both sides honoring their commitments. He stressed that a deal can only be effective when all parties fulfill their respective obligations.

He added that if the United States adheres to the agreed terms, Iran will remain committed to implementing its own obligations.

Although he did not mention any U.S. leader by name, Pezeshkian said Iran would maintain a rational and dignified stance in the face of what he described as baseless accusations or unjustified threats from Washington. He also warned that Tehran would not hesitate to take firm and uncompromising action if its national interests or security were at risk.

His remarks come at a time when tensions between the United States and Iran have not been fully resolved despite ongoing diplomatic contacts and discussions over a possible understanding. Mutual distrust between the two sides remains a major obstacle.

Observers say Pezeshkian's comments signal Iran's willingness to pursue dialogue while reaffirming its determination to defend its national security and sovereignty.
